

IF YOU GIVE AN SLP A COOKIE

If you give an SLP a cookie, she'll want some coffee to go with it. She'll go to pour herself some when she remembers that she has an IEP meeting today at noon.

She'll rush to her computer to print the paperwork. As it prints, she will realize the copier was filled with brightly colored paper. She'll load white paper and reprint the paperwork.

While she's walking back to her office, a teacher will pull her aside to chat about a student. As they are chatting, a student will have a meltdown in the hallway. She'll go to assist.

When she finally sits down at her desk, it'll be too messy to set down the IEPs. She'll clean her desk and find a visual she wanted to give to a teacher.

She'll walk across the school to give the visual to the teacher. They'll thank her and want to discuss concerns about a different student.

On her walk back, another teacher will ask about a schedule change. She'll agree to look into it.

She'll sit down at her desk and open her computer to see a new student with speech services will be starting today.

A fire drill will sound. As she walks outside, she'll see the staff lounge and think of coffee. It will remind her that she never drank the coffee she poured for herself.

And chances are, when the fire drill is over, and she finally gets to drink her coffee, she'll realize she has a group in 2 minutes. She'll scarf down the cookie, take a sip of coffee, and run to get her students.
