

IF YOU GIVE AN SLP A COOKIE

If you give an SLP a cookie, they'll want some coffee to go with it. They'll go to pour themselves some when they remembers that they have an IEP meeting today at noon.

They'll rush to their computer to print the paperwork. As it prints, they will realize the copier was filled with brightly colored paper. They'll load white paper and reprint the paperwork.

While they're walking back to their office, a teacher will pull them aside to chat about a student. As they are chatting, a student will have a meltdown in the hallway. They'll go to assist.

When they finally sits down at their desk, it'll be too messy to set down the IEPs. They'll clean their desk and find a visual they wanted to give to a teacher.

They'll walk across the school to give the visual to the teacher. They'll thank them and want to discuss concerns about a different student.

On their walk back, another teacher will ask about a schedule change. They'll agree to look into it.

They'll sit down at their desk and open their computer to see a new student with speech services will be starting today.

A fire drill will sound. As they walk outside, they'll see the staff lounge and think of coffee. It will remind them that they never drank the coffee they poured for themselves.

And chances are, when the fire drill is over, and they finally get to drink their coffee, they'll realize they have a group in 2 minutes. They'll scarf down the cookie, take a sip of coffee, and run to get their students.
